Jul 27, 2018 [Product]( ).No project that was studied met objective environmental standards. A variety of inconsistent data on type and size of materials used to prepare the buildings and streets showed that building materials are likely to deteriorate the quality of air and water. Most notable, materials used in the many parking structures that are part of the underserved area's modernist complex of adjacent public buildings, such as the Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and Museum, were particularly poor. The New Street Facility, a former bus station, was built with 8,200 concrete-block units, each measuring 8 sq. ft., of which only about half were air-sealed. The air pollution modeling to assess the facility's air quality showed that 15 to 20 percent of the blocks were likely to contribute substantially to the facility's ozone contamination. Exterior building materials had been used for years on the building's site. In addition, old and new paints were applied to the building's exterior. The Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and Museum currently has nine buildings, including three that house the library's collections, two exhibition spaces, and an auditorium. Because of financial difficulties, an exterior renovation program was halted in 1979. Over the years, a number of structural deficiencies have been discovered, including building materials that have deteriorated. In particular, the roofs of two structures are leaking. A January 1985 report by the City Utilities Department indicated that the roofs on the library's Reed Memorial Hall and the science building would have to be replaced by October 1986. An October 1988 survey of the facilities'
