In a series of experiments, we will determine whether LDL receptors are present and functional in monocytes and macrophages isolated from the blood of patients with cerebrovascular diseases and Alzheimer's disease and from normal control subjects. We will first prepare monocytes and macrophages from blood of normal control subjects and Alzheimer's disease patients and determine the levels of the receptor by using a specific ligand, 125I-LDL. We will extend the binding studies to determine whether LDL receptors are functional in these cells. We will first culture cells isolated from blood of normal control subjects and patients with Alzheimer's disease in the presence of LDL. We will then use a "chaining" procedure to determine if LDL receptors in the monocytes and macrophages from normal control subjects and Alzheimer's disease patients can mediate uptake of LDL. We will repeat the LDL uptake studies using LDL labelled with 3H. If LDL receptors function in cells from Alzheimer's disease patients, we will attempt to determine the relationship of LDL uptake to the amount of cell-associated and free LDL. Monocytes and macrophages are the cells most likely to take up LDL in the vascular wall, and therefore an investigation of the pathogenesis of the disease may be possible by determining whether these cells are defective in LDL uptake in the disease. This information may aid in the therapeutic management of the disease by providing a target for future drug therapy.
